It also applies to the EEC countries, which is not EU.
so maybe second is NO..?

The questions just asks if it applies to countries in the EU, it doesn't say "only" the EU, so the second answer is YES imo.

Second question is arguable, because providing goods and services in EU doesn't indicate that actually you are collecting users data plus manage it, and this is what GDPR is about.

Not arguable, how are you supposed to sell to someone in the EU if you don't know anything about him, even his card details. Sorry No confusion in the questions.

Credit card data, billing address etc everything falls under gdpr. You would sell with cash only or anonymously with bitcoin only

2nd option is correct, refer "What rights must companies enable under GDPR?" under General Questions on <https://www.microsoft.com/en-in/trust-center/privacy/gdpr-faqs>

You can argue that the second option is no as the GDPR applies to every EU citizen whether they are inside or outside the EU.
